

Anti-Inflammatory diet tips

You don't have to follow any anti-inflammatory (AI) diet perfectly to make a big impact. Anti-inflammatory diets may be a big adjustment for people who tend to eat different kinds of food, however, there are several resources which document how you can support and better manage inflammation through diet

AI (anti-inflammatory) foods pose no harmful side effects and are relatively cheap and easy to get hold of. Here are some of our top tips for getting some AI foods into your diet.

1. Aim for half to two-thirds of your plate to be non-starchy vegetables (think: greens of all kinds, mushrooms, summer squash, beets, cauliflower...the list goes on and on)—ideally at breakfast, too.

They're packed with gut-balancing fibre and powerful antioxidants.

2. Limit added sugar and sweet drinks. That includes fruit juices and natural sweeteners like honey. Studies have shown that people who have a high-sugar diet have significantly elevated blood levels of haptoglobin (an inflammatory marker that in high concentrations is associated with diabetes, heart attack, stroke, and obesity) compared with controls.

3. Eat fish, especially fatty kinds like salmon, mackerel, herring, and anchovies. (Or take omega-3 supplements—check what is the appropriate amount for you or your child and seek advice from their GP or a dietician before starting any supplements). In some studies Omega 3 has also been shown to be potentially important in brain development and function. Nuts, seeds and green vegetables are also good sources of omega-3.

4. Limit white flour and limit other flour-based foods. Focus on whole, intact grains like quinoa, brown rice, and bulgur wheat. 100 percent white flour causes a spike in blood sugar that can exacerbate inflammation.

5. Choose fats carefully. The most abundant saturated fats in our diet contain the same fatty acids as do fragments of the cell walls of many bacteria; no wonder your immune system sees a bacon cheeseburger as a threat! Limit saturated fats like butter and vegetable oils such as sunflower and corn oils. Go for olive, rapeseed avocado, or walnut oil instead.

The Mediterranean diet is often referred to by medical professionals as the most effective anti-inflammatory diet as it's an eating plan and not just about individual foods.

There are several things a person can do to make the transition to an anti-inflammatory diet easier, including:

- eating a variety of fruits and vegetables
- reducing the amount of fast food eaten
- eliminating fizzy drinks and sugary beverages
- planning shopping lists to ensure healthful meals and snacks are on hand
- carrying small anti-inflammatory snacks while on the go
- drinking more water
- staying within the daily calorie requirements
- adding supplements, such as omega-3 and turmeric, to the diet
- exercising regularly
- getting the proper amount of sleep

To get started on a Mediterranean diet:

- Focus on fruits and vegetables and make these the staple of the diet.
- Eat beans, nuts, and whole grains daily.
- Season foods with herbs and spices instead of salt, fat, and sugar.
- Cook food with olive or avocado oil as standard, instead of butter.
- Focus on lean proteins, primarily fish, and eat less than 3 ounces red meat per week.
- Limit the intake of sweet and high-sugar foods and base most dessert intake around fruit

The recipes below are quite typical of something you might choose to prepare if you are on an anti-inflammatory diet. Add as many vegetable side dishes to accompany these meals as you like.
